ABSTRACT:

G proteins and their associated receptors form the largest class of proteins that receive and transduce chemical and sensory signals. Regulation of G proteins therefore, is critical to appropriate cellular responses. The work in this thesis evaluates a new function for a known regulator of signaling and identifies a new class of previously unknown regulators that mediate G protein trafficking.