

ARAB AMERICAN HERITAGE MONTH

April

Arab American Heritage Month has its roots in the efforts of Arab American organizations, activists, and community leaders to raise awareness and recognition of Arab American culture and history. It originated as a grassroots movement to celebrate the contributions and achievements of Arab Americans while also addressing issues such as discrimination and stereotyping.

In 1997, Representative Nick Rahall of West Virginia introduced a resolution in the U.S. House of Representatives designating April as Arab American Heritage Month. The resolution aimed to honor the cultural and historical contributions of Arab Americans to American society and to promote awareness and understanding of Arab American heritage.

Today, Arab American Heritage Month continues to be celebrated through a variety of events, including cultural performances, art exhibitions, film screenings, panel discussions, and community festivals. It serves as an opportunity to highlight the diversity and resilience of Arab American identities and to promote cross-cultural understanding and appreciation.
